Our trusty and well beloved Peter Malcolm de Brissac Dickinson ...

yes, I know, intellectually, that the phrase, after centuries, is boilerplate -- but it's the very BEST boilerplate! Classy.

Yes, I particularly like the trusty and well beloved myself. I'm glad it's legible on other people's screens.

Oh, my. Oh, my, my, MY. Classy, yes. Having copped the wording of various bits of formality in books from the British (a letter of marque here, an order of attainder there...) I am now tempted to have various fictional sovereigns have honors lists of their own, for the sheer pleasure of using such phrases. In fact (jots something down) it might even fix that gaping hole in the logic of one of them. Yes...it works. The Queen's gracious favor reaches a lot farther than her own subjects, though she'll never know it (or care.)

It's lovely. Makes me (despite terminal travel-and-convention tiredness) want to cheer.

I'm impressed. And I can't even read any words other than the ones in black!

Gorgeous writing and I'm most impressed with how clear the the stamps are. I wonder if they carefully inspect them and discard any smudged ones.

And very nice too! I love that formal language, but it's as well we don't have to write in it all the time, isn't it (this is definitely ultra-high-forsoothly!).

You are going to go to the Palace, aren't you, not just having the medal sent in the post, the way another friend who was honoured at the same time as Peter plans to do?

YES. I keep wanting to invent honours lists and deciding that this is just one of those dangerous forked paths of distraction. :)

Well, they're ALL in black. But won't your screen let you click them bigger? I was counting on that. Then you can read ALL of it.

I can only count to 18. It's a genetic disorder. Tragic. :)
